Arts for Learning
2014-2015 Annual Report

Adaptation and flexibility are essential to the growth of any business, but particularly for nonprofits like Arts for Learning, who serve the ever-changing field of education. At the same time, change can be risky, especially involving tried and true programs, programs that have been part of the organization's history, identity, and brand.

During the 2013-2014 school year, Arts for Learning underwent many adaptations and changes, leading to the growth of several programs. Some changes were no-brainers, like the expansion of our early childhood program to serve infants and toddlers. Others carried more risk, like our decision to completely overhaul our summer programming. All of these changes involved robust community partnerships which, with the support of donors like you, maximized the impact on the children we serve.

We invite you to explore a glimpse of that impact in this annual report. For a more detailed report, please visit our website at artsforlearningindiana.org. On behalf of the children, educators, and teaching artists we serve, thank you for making our work possible.

"Not only does music make things easier to grasp for children, it can also draw their attention from what they're focused on to what the teacher wants them to focus on."
- Head Start teacher

Four school teachers paired with teaching artists to provide arts-integrated literacy curriculum to 93 inner-city youth at La Plaza and AYS. 70% of students assessed during the program demonstrated increased reading comprehension skills in just two weeks.

"I was so excited when our class was called down to see the mural for the first time. It will be such an honor to come back and see my art on display when I am older." - Fifth grade student at Eastern Pulaski Elementary

13 high school apprentices guided by one teaching artist and three Ivy Tech Community College student mentors designed and delivered their own arts workshops to 75 AYS campers. 81% of the apprentices found the program challenging and 87% said they would return next year.
